Dear Friends,

Every so often people ask me what the Dutch cuisine is like. It's not great, I tell them.

My granddad once stayed at a hotel where he was served a pasta dish. He had never seen such exotic food before, and he was pleasantly surprised by the taste of it. On his return home he set out to recreate this culinary delight for the family. He bought a pack of Macaroni, and managed to cook it according to instructions. So far so good. He then opened a tin of Spam, sliced the meat into small cubes, and fried it with a few teaspoons of Indonesian curry powder. The greasy curried spam was added to the cooked pasta – et voila: Eet Smakelijk! Believe it or not, the dish was an instant hit and soon became a family classic...

Somehow I doubt that this recipe will ever end up in a cooking book. Not only is my granddad's Macaroni somewhat lacking nutritiously, but it also commits the culinary sin of combining curry with pasta. How dare someone compromise the distinct integrity of the Asian and Italian kitchens, I hear the food fashionistas protest. I agree. But on the other hand, what's the problem?

Maybe we would do well to realise that many of the precious rules and principles we live by are quite simply our grandparent's inventions. Often we do things a certain way only because that's how we've always done it. People who question this status quo are thought to be ill-adjusted and unorthodox.

So was Jesus. He held up a mirror to the people around him. He challenged their prejudices and questioned the validity of their man-made rules. He told his followers to be courageously different. He said: You are the salt of the earth! Which makes me wonder: Have we become too bland?

Love and prayers,

We thank everyone who has supported us over the years on our fund raising activities. Kathleen Pepper
