Dear friends,

As I type I'm sitting in one of the student bars, and not very far away there is a large screen showing England v Wales in the European Football Championships. It's not very quiet or gentle, but it is at least good natured.

I've spent part of this afternoon helping to edit a postgraduate prospectus for international students, noting as I did so that York is one of the 100 most international universities in the world. Also, the senseless shooting of so many in a gay nightclub in the US continues to dominate the news, and by the time you read this, we'll know whether we remain in or leave the EU over the next few years.

"Otherness" is good for us.

Healthy cohesion and progress in communities like ours are not brought about by sameness, but by dialogue with otherness and with difference. It may be uncomfortable, and it may feel threatening at times. The things we call "culture" and "tradition" and "local" may, in fact do, shift and move.

I work across at least three Christian traditions, alongside people of all faiths and none, listening to and taking part in conversations shaped by ideas, beliefs and experiences from every corner of the globe, and I am the richer for it and very lucky to have the privilege of the work that I do, but sometimes it's not easy.

Our political leaders have not been in dialogue with otherness or with difference very well in these past weeks, months, perhaps years. They have on the whole resorted very quickly to caricatures, name-calling and glee at the humanness and contradictions they find in their opponents, unacknowledged in themselves, publicly at least. Their example has been poor.

Jesus drew around himself a very diverse community of people who would embody belonging and shared responsibility in their otherness. It wasn't easy then, and it isn't now, but it is the measure of us in so many ways.

Regards
Rory
